

YOUNG ADULTS FACE POSSIBLE DEPORTATION

by ISRAA MASHREQUE

Many people come to America from all over the world. More or less these people come to get a better education or to live a better life than they would have had in their home countries.

Over 11 million of these people came to the United States undocumented from mostly Latin American countries. In order to protect these people from deportation, former president Barack Obama established a program called Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals, also known as DACA.

DACA allows undocumented immigrants brought to this country as minors to receive a renewable two-year period of deferred action from deportation, a social security number, and a work permit.

In order to request DACA you must be under 16 when you were brought to the country and you can request it between the ages 15-31.

This program brought many undocumented immigrants hope that they would eventually be allowed to apply for citizenship with this program.

However, this all changed when President Donald Trump announced that he will end this program in six months unless Congress has another plan for these immigrants.

We tell them to go back to their “home” and make fun of them for not looking like us, but when they go back to their “homes” they will be made fun of for not talking or acting like everyone else. So really, where is their home?

If this program is put into place there will be no chance of America succeeding in any way, shape, or form. These millions of people that have grown up in America and know it as their only home, should not even have to imagine giving up their friends, homes, education, and careers.

These people are referred to as “Dreamers” because they have ambitions just like everyone else. They attend school and work everyday to build a stable ground in order to fulfill the goals they have for their lives here in America.
